When director Ana Lily Amirpour showed up to Jim Carrey's art studio, she wore a pillowcase over her head, featuring two cut-out eyeholes and a Sharpie frownie face. She was there to convince the megastar that he'd want to play the small role of a homeless desert wanderer in her upcoming film, The Bad Batch, a much-anticipated follow-up to her Iranian-vampire-Western, art-house hit A Girl Walks Home Alone at Night. The character would not speak, his beard and long hair would cover much of his face, and he'd only be on-screen for a few minutes. Amirpour's producers had let out a gasp when she told them on the phone — on the way over to Carrey's studio — that that was the role she was actually offering him, not the one of the wacky, whimsical doctor they'd previously agreed upon. But Amirpour had sent Carrey A Girl Walks Home Alone at Night to watch, and he loved it, and she knew right then he would take the role.

"When he opened the door, he had this full beard like the character, and I had goose bumps," Amirpour says, taking a break from slurping her fruit smoothie at Swingers Diner here in Santa Monica. "Right away, I gave him a pillowcase with a happy face, and said, 'Just put this on because you're Jim Carrey and I need to acclimate.' We both had these pillowcases on — on the way over to Carrey's studio — that that was the role she was actually offering him, not the one of the wacky, whimsical doctor they'd previously agreed upon. Ana Lily Amirpour is not a household name yet, like Quentin Tarantino or Kathryn Bigelow. But the indie auteur is about to break out. Although she had only written and directed one feature — her 2014 Farsi-language, A Girl Walks Home... — Annapurna Pictures welcomed her to the fold for her sophomore effort, The Bad Batch, which hits theaters in June. elaborately constructed dwellings could all disappear in an instant. She researched people who live off the grid, like the resi-

12 REASONS WHY YOU DON’T NEED TO FEAR 2017’S SUMMER MOVIE SEASON

BY CHRIS KLIMEK

Our one out for the summer movie season, which was once Memorial Day till Labor Day but now has spread like a self-replicating, geometrically evolving A.I. determined to cleanse the Earth of human vermin. Around the turn of the century, the summer movies started showing up the first weekend in May; a few years after that, they hit in March. Now, no square of the calendar is safe from would-be, four-quadrant seat fillers. But we’re traditionalists, so our roundup of the hot-weather months’ dozen most promising national releases observes the Memorial Day–to-Labor Day boundaries of old.

[Note: While a handful of these films have already screened at festivals, the author has seen exactly none of them.]

Wonder Woman (June 2) — Gal Gadot’s commanding take on the Amazonian warrior princess almost made last year’s turgid Batman v Superman: Dawn of Justice worth enduring. Her solo flick unspools during World War I — period settings seem to help these movies be more fun, as evidenced by Captain America: The First Avenger and X-Men: First Class — and the trailers have boasted actual jokes along with the requisite clash-of-the-titans visuals. (As Steve Trevor, Diana’s sort-of love interest, Chris Pine appears to dial his Captain Kirk swagger down to Impulse Power, which is plenty.) DC Comics’ best hope to turn its dour and weirdly unheroic cinematic universe around comes from director Patty Jenkins, who’s been working mostly in TV since she made Monster 14 years ago; this is the first big, comic book adaptation directed by a woman. And it only took 40 years!

It Comes at Night (June 9) — A24, the five-year-old art-house powerhouse that brought you The Witch, The Lobster and Moonlight last year alone, has shown impeccable taste. So if writer-director Trey Edward Shults’ sophomore feature (after 2015’s powerful Krisha) sounds a little bit familiar — holed up in their fortified home after some herd-thinning calamity, a family of survivalists must decide whether to give succor to strangers — we’re inclined to give him the benefit of the doubt. The cast includes the ever-reliable Joel Edgerton, Mad Max: Fury Road’s Riley Keough, and Christopher Abbott, whose performance in the 2015 Broadway production of Annie Baker’s play John proved he can mine a pause for tension as profitably as anyone.

Rough Night (June 16) — Scarlett Johansson, Kate McKinnon, Jillian Bell and Ilana Glazer star in co-writer and director Lucia Aniello’s feature debut, wherein five college pals reunited for a bachelorette bash kill a male stripper and try to cover up their crime. Think Very Bad Things with more Zoë Kravitz and a lot less Jeremy Piven.
If yes, you may be able to join a study where you add FDA-approved medication to your HIV-regimen to improve neurocognitive performance.

This study is for HIV-positive people who also have HIV-associated neurocognitive disorder (HAND) as defined by the Frascati criteria. It will help us to identify if adding Maraviroc (MVC) and/or Dolutegravir (DTG) to their current antiretroviral therapy will improve neurocognitive performance. Participants will be enrolled in this study for about 96 weeks. Compensation will be provided.

To join you must be:
• 18 years of age or older
• HIV-positive with an undetectable viral load
• Have had a HIV-associated neurocognitive disorder within 45 days prior to study entry
• Have had a HIV-associated neurocognitive disorder within 45 days prior to study entry

UCLA Research Study

Are you interested in participating in a study focused on improving heart health?

If yes, you may be able to join a study where you add an FDA-approved medication to your HIV-regimen to help prevent cardiovascular disease (CVD).

This study is for HIV-positive people who are taking antiretroviral therapy and are interested in strategies to reduce heart disease

Statins are a group of medicines used to lower cholesterol and triglycerides (fat in the blood) and to prevent problems related to heart disease, such as heart attacks in persons with high risk for heart attacks.

To join you must be:
• Between the ages of 40 and 75
• HIV-positive
• On antiretroviral therapy for at least 6 months
• T-cell count at or above 100

A severely injured Union soldier (Colin Farrell) recuperating at a girls’ school peopleled by Kirsten Dunst, Nicole Kidman, Elle Fanning and Angourie Rice, who more than held her own against Ryan Gosling and Russell Crowe in last year’s very funny The Nice Guys. Thomas P. Cullinan’s Southern Gothic source novel, A Painted Devil, was previously adapted by Don Siegel and Clint Eastwood (as the soldier) right before they made Dirty Harry together, and something about their collaboration makes me feel … lucky.

Spider-Man: Homecoming (July 7) — Yes, the movies have burnt through more amazing Spider-Men than Spinal Tap has drummers. But Tom Holland, the new kid introduced in Captain America: Civil War last year, is a fine actor (see: The Impossible, The Lost City of Z) and the first guy to play a 15-year-old Peter Parker while he’s closer to 15 than to 30. Director Jon Watts made the strong indie thriller Cop Car, and here he has Donald Glover, Tony Revolori and Michael “Batnman Returns” Keaton, along with Marisa Tomei as Peter’s similarly youth-anized Aunt May, and Robert Downey Jr. as Stilt-Man, I think it was. Another plus: Michael Giacchino is composing the score. So just perhaps Spider-Man’s official entry into the Marvel cinematic universe will be celebrated with some original music you can actually hum on your way home. Which would be a first for one of these.

War for the Planet of the Apes (July 14) — Scoff if you must, but Fox’s series of prequels-not-reboots to the Apes cycle made during the Vietnam War is one of the most resonant franchises of the current decade. Maybe it’s because the problems of race relations and environmental abuse those guileless original films investigated in their far-future clothing have never gone away. Director Matt Reeves returns from 2014’s Dawn of the Planet of the Apes for this third chapter, as does Andy Serkis, reprising his role as sympathetic ape leader Caesar. Also stars Woody Harrelson, who’ll do anything. It’s not looking good for our team, Humans of Earth.

Dunkirk (July 21) — Christopher Nolan’s IMAX World War II epic, about the 1940 evacuation of what Winston Churchill called “the whole root and core and brain of the British Army” from occupied France, looks like a stunner, based on the brief excerpt shown before selected IMAX screenings of Rogue One: A Star Wars Story last December. Mark Rylance, the beloved stage actor who won an Oscar for the underrated Bridge of Spies, stars as one of the many civilian seamen who mobilized to rescue the stranded soldiers, as does Harry Styles of the boy-band One Direction, which just might lure a new audience to WWII movies. (It won’t.) The revered British and Irish names just keep on coming: Kenneth Branagh, James D’Arcy, Cillian Murphy. Tom Hardy plays a British spitfire jockey, who perhaps wonders why someone would shoot a man before throwing him out of a plane.

Atomic Blonde (July 28) — There oughta be a law against wasting Charlize “Imperator Furiosa” Theron the way The Fate of the Furious did, but director David Leitch — half of the team of veteran stunt-coordinators-turned-directors who made the fisticuffs in John Wick some of the most brutally elegant ever captured on-screen — won’t make that mistake. Set in Berlin just before the fall came down in 1989, this adaptation of Antony Johnston’s graphic novel The Coldest City casts Theron as an MI6 operative opposite James McAvoy and John Goodman. The neon palette and the synth-driven soundtrack of mid-’80s new-wave gems are both selling points.

Detroit (Aug. 4) — Kathryn Bigelow, who made Point Break and then won an Oscar for directing some other movie, reteams with The Hurt Locker and Zero Dark Thirty screenwriter Mark Boal for this dramatization of 1967’s 12th Street Riot, wherein a police raid of an unlicensed after-hours club (hosting a party for returned Vietnam War vets) escalated into a five-day melee that left 43 people dead. Gov. George Romney sent in the Michigan National Guard; President Lyndon Johnson dispatched elements of the 82nd and 101st Airborne Divisions of the U.S. Army. A cast boasting John Boyega and Anthony Mackie is a strong enticement, but anything Bigelow makes is worth investigating. Her examination of the state’s use of force against (mostly) black people promises to be no less provocative than her consideration of the use of torture in the hunt for Osama bin Laden.

Logan Lucky (Aug. 18) — Steven Soderbergh’s retirement from making features lasted all of four years, during which he unwound by directing 20 hours of The Knick for Cinemax and posting his own fan-edits of Psycho, 2001, Raiders of the Lost Ark and … Heaven’s Gate. He reteams with his old pal Channing Tatum, plus a number of other fine actors he’s using for the first time — Daniel Craig, Katherine Waterston, Adam Driver, Hilary Swank, Riley Keough — for this comedy about a heist during North Carolina’s Coca-Cola 600 NASCAR race. The Soderbergh-Tatum alliance has given us three good movies already, and “Ocean’s 11 with a Southern accent” is an elevator pitch we’re buying.

HONORABLE MENTIONS: The Little Hours (June 30), An Inconvenient Sequel: Truth to Power (July 28), The Trip to Spain (Aug. 11), Terminator 2: Judgment Day 3D rerelease (Aug. 25).
WHAT TO SEE AT THE LA FILM FEST

Los Angeles’ top movie festival kicks off at the ArcLight this summer

BY APRIL WOLFE

Don’t ever say that nothing good comes to the theaters here in Los Angeles, because Film Independent’s LA Film Festival is about to bring a whole new slew of the best of indie film to the city. This is your chance to see every hot movie out there before anyone else does, so don’t blow it. To help you navigate the fest, kicking off June 14-22, we’ve collected the top films we’re most excited about, but do check out the full schedule online — you have no idea how hard it is to narrow this list to just 10.

Izzy Gets the Fuck Across Town
Mackenzie Davis could sneeze for 30 minutes, and I would be rapt. The actor absolutely owned her role as a woman on the verge of a dangerous mental break in last year’s Always Shine and has grown a cult following for her roles in Halt and Catch Fire and Black Mirror’s “San Junipero” episode — she’ll also be in Blade Runner 2049. In Izzy, director Christian Papierniak pairs her with Lakeith Stanfield, Carrie Coon and Annie Potts for a story about a hung-over riot grrrl who manically runs across the city to break up her ex-boyfriend’s bougie engagement party.

Never Here
The premise of this film has shades of Red Road and Blow-Up all over it: An artist photographs strangers, but a “disturbing event” leads her to believe that she’s the one being watched. This is director Camille Thoman’s narrative feature debut. Up until now, she’s mostly done reality or documentary programming, so it’ll be fascinating to see how she utilizes that voyeur knowledge here. Also, Sam Shepard’s in this one, so you know it’s gonna be good.

The Year of Spectacular Men
Lea Thompson is directing now? Thompson’s roles have all but dried up, because Hollywood has nowhere to put talented, middle-aged women. But if Thompson can find a home behind the camera, I’ll be satisfied. This picture about a twenty-something trying to adult while racking up failure after failure stars her daughters Madelyn and Zoey Deutch, who’ve inherited all of their mother’s charm and skill.

Mankiller
The work of Native rights activist Wilma Mankiller was introduced to a new generation when her name was tossed around as a possible for the $20 bill — as a politically driven tribal chief, Mankiller was given Ms. Magazine’s 1987 woman of the year, as well as a Presidential Medal of Freedom. Seems like a perfect time for Valerie Red-Horse Mohl’s documentary to shed some light on this legendary woman, who was largely responsible for a tripled population increase of Cherokee Nation’s citizens.

Skid Row Marathon
I’m a sucker for any media that portrays the residents of Skid Row with humanity. This Mark Hayes doc follows a few of those residents as they begin training for races with a criminal court judge who’s organized a running club. I will probably cry.

Moko Jumbie
Director Vashti Anderson seems to have a fascination with noir and has brought the genre to Trinidad and Tobago for this strange-some. In it, a young woman visits a coconut plantation and falls in love with a fisherman, but political turmoil and visits from some ancestral ghosts threaten to blow up the affair.

Don’t Come Back From the Moon
Bruce Thierry Cheung’s possibly speculative Western about a town whose men all suddenly disappear sounds like it’ll be the perfect film to explore gender roles and the American obsession of lighting out for the territory. Rashida Jones is in this one, and it’s exciting that we might get to see her in a more serious role.

The north end of Silver Lake gets a trendy spot to match its reputation

BY BESHA RODELL

The Sunset Junction of 2010 was a very different place from the Sunset Junction of 2017. The portion of Sunset Boulevard that runs through Silver Lake has been a magnet for artists and bohemia for decades, but seven years ago it still had its grungy aesthetic, and there weren’t quite so many places where one might purchase $300 shirts or $5 coffee drinks. You could rent one of the wonderfully shabby old bungalows in the hills above the boulevard for less than $4,000 a month. Silver Lake was well on the hills above the boulevard for less than the wonderfully shabby old bungalows in

Like Forage, a restaurant that opened in 2010 and served faro and pea salads from a cafeteria-style counter, and which encouraged people from the neighborhood to bring in produce they’d grown (or foraged) themselves for inclusion on the menu. Though the customer-grown component proved too difficult to remain a core principle — for reasons of health department rules and ultimately plain logistics — Forage is still going strong, and still using produce from many local, nonprofessional growers. Now its owners, Jason and Chrissy Kim (Jason an alumnus of restaurants such as Lucques and L’Orangerie) are branching out, and in doing so they’re participating in the transformation of another slice of Silver Lake.

The Kims’ new restaurant, Wolfdown, sits on Rowena Avenue in an edge of the neighborhood that has always been a little sleepier and more residential than the Sunset Boulevard thoroughfare. “Gentrification” is a hard term to use about this part of Silver Lake, because although housing prices here have skyrocketed in recent years (I used to live there; I can no longer afford the luxury), it’s long been a fairly upscale enclave. But Rowena Avenue itself, and the curve around and onto Glendale Avenue, were both a bastion of cheaper apartments. It was also home to low-key restaurants like the one that Wolfdown replaced: Nicky D’s Pizza Wood Fired Pizza, an old-school Italian joint in a collection of somewhat rickety structures built into the side of the hill. Now Moby has a vegan restaurant on Rowena. Around the curve, Whole Foods 365 has replaced one of the crappiest Ralphs the world has ever seen. In Wolfdown’s new space, those rickety buildings have been transformed into a boho-chic fantasy that feels a bit like a mountain lodge and a bit like a tropical hideaway. The two-level dining room is wood and brick, and an open kitchen emits the smell of wood smoke. Outside the patio sits under a canopy of green trees. The restaurant captures the magic of a treehouse, of climbing up off the street and into a woody, leafy world above it all.

The menu is international in scope, with lots of Asian influence and the same focus on showcasing produce that gave Forage its reputation. There’s a luminously flavored green garlic bisque dotted with explosively sweet orange cherry tomatoes, its basil garnish and the light sting of the garlic combining for something a little like Thai green curry but much subtler. There are lots of salad variations, most of which focus on contrasts between bitter greens and bright citrus, as well as some sort of creamy element — green goddess dressing; avocado. A chicken and shrimp dumpling is almost more like a burger patty than a dumpling, though there is a barely perceptible, thin, crackly dumpling skin around the puck-shaped disk. Whatever it is, it’s good to eat — full of garlicky flavor and topped with a flurry of arugula and mustard frills.

There are dishes that could easily act as the subject of a graduate dissertation on modern American food and its cultural signifiers, such as an “Ethiopian-style” steak tartare served with crackers the shape of the Wu-Tang logo. This isn’t much like kitfo, the traditional raw-beef Ethiopian dish, but is delicious with its curry-like collection of spices that bleeds yellow onto the plate. Why the Wu-Tang crackers? I’ll leave that to the status and symbol academics to decipher.

Wolfdown starts strong and falters a bit when you move into larger plates, in part because it’s not clear why these plates are larger. The fun of a menu like this is built on the ability to taste a ton of stuff, and the portion and prices on the lower half of the menu limit that ability, mostly with dishes that would work just as well at half the size (and half the price).

The Korean fried chicken plate includes two legs and two thighs for $25; choose either a spicy chili or soy honey glaze. I’d much rather have a smaller portion and a smaller bill. (I also found the chicken a bit dry and the chili sauce a little too gloppy, stealing the crisp from the chicken’s skin.) I felt similarly about the $35 pork belly bosassum, which comes fanned out on a plate next to a pile of fantastic radish kimchee and a bunch of lettuce and shiso leaves for wrapping. Underneath it all is an “oyster tartare,” a kind of smooth of raw oyster that’s been minced up, and which is a little disconcerting texturally, as well as overwhelmed by the other flavors on the plate. But the slightly dry pork was my real complaint about the dish, as well as the fact that I’d rather eat less of it (and pay less).

Wolfdown, like Forage, represents an evolution for the neighborhood. The wine, beer and sake lists are pretty great, the space is beautiful, and the food is mostly smart, creative and on-trend without being too derivative. If I’d never been priced out of Silver Lake, I would have been able to walk to Wolfdown from my house, and I’d have been happy for the opportunity. Would I drive across town to eat here? It’s doubtful. But with all the money and traffic flooding into this part of town, it’s also doubtful they’ll need me to.

Adolf Dulan rose to fame with Hamburger City

BY KATHERINE SPIERS

Adolf Dulan, the founder of legendary L.A. restaurants Hamburger City, Aunt Kizzy’s Back Porch and Dulan’s Soul Food Kitchen, passed away on May 1. He was 83.

Dulan was born in Oklahoma and moved to Los Angeles to be a social worker. In 1975, he purchased an Orange Julius franchise, and two years later turned it into his own restaurant, Hamburger City, which at one point had five locations around town. It was a savvy move — L.A. loves burgers.

In the early 1980s, Dulan turned the biggest Hamburger City location, in Marina del Rey, into Aunt Kizzy’s Back Porch, a soul food restaurant that soon had both a local and celebrity clientele. The menu included a lot of baked meats, plus smothered pork chops, meatloaf and fried chicken, all served with cornbread. On weekends, brunch included chicken and waffles. The man knew what the city wanted.

Dulan became a bit of a celebrity, appearing in national commercials for Lawry’s Seasoned Salt. He referred to himself as “The King of Soul Food,” and it’s fair to say that there wasn’t anyone in Los Angeles bringing as much attention to the Southern cuisine. Aunt Kizzy’s eventually closed, but Dulan’s legacy lives on in two eponymous restaurants now run by his family: Dulan’s on Crenshaw and Dulan’s Soul Food Kitchen.

Keep Dulan in mind next time you eat a gourmet burger or fancy mac and cheese or the city’s current food craze, fried chicken. His menus got us to this delicious place.

The “Asian Whole Foods” Is Expanding Across The San Gabriel Valley

“People call us the Asian Whole Foods,” says Joseph Lee, the owner of LOHAS Fresh Mart, a boutique Asian grocery store with four locations — Alhambra, Diamond Bar, Arcadia and Rowland Heights — around the San Gabriel Valley. The one in Alhambra is the flagship. It’s stunningly similar to the boutique grocery stores of Taiwan.

Everything is neatly stacked. To the immediate left of the door is a pristine produce aisle. You might find bok choy from Riverside and all sorts of organic mushrooms. Each fruit or vegetable has a sticker that indicates whether it is USDA-certified organic. Most is. Down the line are the proteins: Meats and seafood are carefully marked with their source. An aisle is dedicated to sauces made by small vendors in Taiwan.

Most of the seafood comes from a popular company called Tanhou, a reputable seafood supplier that raises fish in aquaculture operations in Taiwan’s Penghu County. Milkfish is one of the options. It’s a type of sole prized by the Taiwanese, so beloved that there’s a museum dedicated to the fish in Taiwan.

In the early ‘90s, my parents used to smuggle frozen milkfish in Styrofoam from Taiwan in our suitcases back in the early ‘90s. This would’ve saved us a lot of trouble.

LOHAS stands for Lifestyles of Health and Sustainability, an acronym invented by American sociologist Paul H. Ray. It’s a term that is used widely in Taiwan, South Korea, Malaysia, Japan and Singapore, referring to a holistic lifestyle centered on green living; it champions products that are grown with minimal damage to the environment. Its adherents are a market segment that in 2012 purchased roughly $350 billion in goods and services worldwide.

“LOHAS is basically like a green buzzword,” says Nate Maynard, a Taiwan-based environmental researcher. “Taiwan loves buzzwords. There are no NGOs here, which play a major role in regulating terminology. So LOHAS just stuck as a term for healthy lifestyles.”

Of course, what is healthy is subjective. Aesthetically, the store is a direct reflection of the Taiwanese interpretation of LOHAS: unblemished produce and beautifully packaged products. Behind all of that is the firm belief that organic foods are better for people.

“I’d say about 30 to 40 percent of our products come from Taiwan. The produce and meats are local, though,” Lee, an immigrant from Taiwan, says. He came up with the store concept after realizing

A Casual Seafood Spot Hits The Valley

Frankland’s is not actually a shack — it is a storefront in a strip mall — but the menu is reminiscent of one, offering fish and chips, fried clams, lobster rolls and chowder. (The latter is a bit untraditional, with crab, lobster and prawns.) Seafood should never be cheap, but the entree prices at Frankland’s are reasonable, topping out at $18 for a king crab roll.

“Top 10 Ramen in Los Angeles”

“Taiwan is really leading the movement on organic foods and the environment,” Lee says. “Foodwise, it’s more modern than mainland China and it has been a trendsetter in cuisine because it did not go through the Cultural Revolution.”

Lee says he noticed a demand for certified organic products within the Taiwanese community here in Los Angeles, and opened LOHAS with that customer segment in mind. The stores sell bunches of zongzi, a Chinese tamale that’s popular in Taiwan around the Dragon Boat Festival in the summer. They come in several flavors: pork, red bean, mugwort, vegetarian. Instead of microwavable pancakes or pizza in the frozen aisle, you’ll find packaged steamed buns and scallion pancakes from a well-known Taiwanese company, Lee says the scallion pancakes is one of the best-sellers.

Though he created the store with Taiwanese people in mind, his customers are a mixture of mainland Chinese and Taiwanese, typically in the higher-income bracket. Like Whole Foods, LOHAS has steeper prices than conventional grocery stores. But he’s noticed that people are willing to pay.

“You won’t see us handing out discount flyers or slashing prices like other Asian grocery stores,” he says. (Though there is a $2 off every $20 purchase for “VIPS” advertised on the website.) “Our emphasis is on quality.”

His goal is to get LOHAS in almost every city in the San Gabriel Valley.

“It’s all about good ingredients. In Chinese, food is medicine and medicine is food. If it’s good, people will come,” he says. —Clarissa Wei

Step by Step
Dance seldom emerges in its completed form the first time out. Rather, it tends to evolve as a choreographer actually sees the work performed, through the filters of real-time dancing and audience reaction. Incubation: A Choreographers’ Showcase is L.A. Contemporary Dance Company’s chance for choreographers and audiences to test-run several new and in-progress dances before they achieve completion next season. MUSIC

Classical Iconoclast
With her astonishing technique and dashing speed, Yuja Wang is a virtual rock star in the often-staid world of classical music. The 30-year-old Chinese pianist can easily sell out the Hollywood Bowl, but some critics — usually conservative, older men — still harrumph about the short hem length of her designer dresses and grouch that she shouldn’t be able to manipulate the piano’s pedals so adroitly in steep, 5-inch heels. Wang can take a quintessentially traditional piece such as Mozart’s “Turkish March” and infuse it with madcap bursts of jazz, barrelhouse piano and febrile allusions to other composers. But for all of her dexterity, she’ll also wear high heels of madcap bursts of jazz, barrelhouse piano and febrile allusions to other composers. THEATER

The Anatomy of a Crisis
The description of the new production The Tug of War may sound uncomfortably familiar: “With the world on the brink of war, the judgment of an untested president is called into question.” But, David Rambo’s staged docudrama is about John F. Kennedy and the Cuban missile crisis, not Orange Mussolini and whatever near-nuclear catastrophe he’s embroiled us in this week. Commissioned by L.A. Theatre Works, the production has a star-laden cast that includes Matthew Arkin and Mad Men’s Rich Sommer, and a foley artist will be producing sound effects live onstage. Can’t make it to the show? The production will run as a radio broadcast via KPFA, as well as in podcast form. James Bridges Theater, 235 Charles E. Young Drive, Westwood; Fri., May 26, 8 p.m. (also Sat.-Sun., May 27-28); $15-$60. (310) 827-0889, latw.org. —Gwynedd Stuart

OUTDOOR FESTIVALS

Yes We Canyon
Nestled in the Santa Monica Mountains between the West Valley and Pacific Palisades, Topanga Canyon is home to the Topanga Canyon Community Center, a local nonprofit that hosts the annual Topanga Days celebration. An L.A. institution dating back to 1973, the Memorial Weekend shindig is equal parts music festival, vendor village and carnival-food bonanza. This year’s incarnation features headliners Jefferson Starship and L.A.’s own Ozomatli, along with dozens of others playing the fundraiser for the TCC. It all culminates with a parade of animals, humans and colorful floats, transporting guests to the lazy, hazy, hippie-style bliss of SoCal’s canyon culture. Topanga Community Center, 1440 N. Topanga Canyon Blvd., Topanga; Sat.-Mon., May 27-29, 10 a.m.-7 p.m.; Memorial Day Parade is Mon., May 29, 8:30 a.m.-noon; $15, $40 three-day pass. (310) 455-1980, topangadays.com. —Tanja M. Laden

FOOD & DRINK

Just Veg
Eat Drink Vegan is definitely the year’s biggest vegetable-forward food event in Los Angeles County — just be sure to note that food is not included in the ticket price. What is included? All the liquids you can dream of. (The bathroom lines will perhaps be crazy.) You’ll get a tasting glass upon entry, which you can fill with wine, cider, kombucha, tea, cold-brew coffee, sodas and beer. More than 75 food vendors will also be on hand, some of whom are always vegan, others who are creating vegan dishes just for the event, including Broken Spanish, Badmaash, Donna Jean, Sweetfin Poke, Scoops Westside, Peaceful Provisions, Café Gratitude, Trejo’s Tacos and Hanjip. FAN CONVENTIONS

Doyle and Trouble
Seven years after Sherlock premiered on the BBC and turned lanky, pale panty-dropper Benedict Cumberbatch into a star, its official fan convention, Sherlocked, has finally arrived in the United States. Held in the U.K. for the past three years, the three-day fan extravaganza celebrates all things related to the modern TV adaptation of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle’s detective for hire with Q&As, autograph signings, art displays, cosplay parties, original costumes and set pieces from Sherlock Holmes and John Watson’s famous home on 221B Baker Street. Among the stars scheduled to appear are series actors Andrew Scott, Amanda Abbington, Una Stubbs, Louis Moffat, Alistair Petrie and Cumberbatch’s parents, Timothy Carlton and Wanda Ventham, as well as creators Mark Gatiss and Steven Moffat, executive producer Sue Vertue and production designer Arwel Wyn Jones. Los Angeles Airport Marriott, 5855 Century Blvd., Westchester; Fri., May 26, 5-8 p.m.; Sat.-Sun., May 27-28, 9 a.m.-6 p.m.; $75-$2,995. sherlockedusa.com. —Siran Babayan

A World of Burt

Burt Bacharach is one of the most influential songwriters of the 20th century, responsible for four dozen top 10 hits and nine No. 1 singles, from amongst the hundreds of songs he composed with writing partner Hal David. With his signature brand of jazz-inflected orchestral pop, Bacharach penned such hits as “Walk On By,” “Say a Little Prayer” and “Raindrops Keep Falling on My Head,” for a wide range of artists from Dusty Springfield to Tom Jones, and, of course, Dionne Warwick, for whom he wrote 38 chart-topping tracks over the course of their long collaboration. Although he is often associated with the “easy listening” genre, Bacharach elevated the average pop-song format, creating standards that still resonate 50 years after their original release. DONDE ESTA ANA MENDIETA?

As MOCA honors Carl Andre with a retrospective, local feminist groups call attention to his acquittal in the murder of his wife 30-plus years ago

BY CATHERINE WAGLEY

Had she lived to complete it, artist Ana Mendieta’s La Jungla would have occupied a triangle of grass in MacArthur Park, near where Wilshire Boulevard meets Park View. In 1985, Mendieta was 36 years old and beginning to be recognized for her elegantly visceral installations and performances. She had been planning the MacArthur Park project for more than a year. She called it La Jungla because it would consist of seven redwood tree trunks, kiln-dried to ensure their permanence. They would have images carved or burned into them, representing different spiritual powers.

Adolfo Nodal, who would go on to direct L.A.’s Department of Cultural Affairs, then oversaw a public art-installation series in MacArthur Park. He invited Mendieta, a fellow Cuban-American and longtime friend (she was “like a sister,” he says), to participate. “I actually spoke with her an hour before she got killed,” Nodal remembers.

On Sept. 8, 1985, Mendieta fell from the 34th-floor bedroom window of the Greenwich Village apartment she shared with her husband, Carl Andre. Andre, 16 years her senior and already well established as a minimalist sculptor, was charged with and acquitted of her murder. Several factors — including the lack of material evidence supporting the theory that she jumped, her friends’ insistence that she feared heights, a 911 call in which Andre described chasing her into the bedroom and the judge’s comment that “he probably did it” — have left many feeling the case is unresolved. Andre is “not exactly the art world’s O.J. Simpson,” Christopher Knight wrote in a complimentary but complicated Los Angeles Times review of the exhibition currently at MOCA’s Geffen Contemporary, “Carl Andre: Sculpture as Place, 1958–2010.” But he’s the closest thing to O.J. the U.S. art world has.

MOCA’s Andre exhibition, as with the local Metabolic Studio lit candles and laid out a long, white sheet with black outlines of falling bodies painted on it. “Donde Esta Ana Mendieta?” read the 5,000 postcards curator Joy Silverman, a friend of Mendieta’s, printed to distribute the night of April 1, when MOCA’s show opened, with the goal of inviting conversation among L.A. artists about how to honor and understand Mendieta’s legacy. Members of the feminist collective Association of Hysteric Art Curators are proposing an answer to the question those cards pose: The late artist should be here in Los Angeles, represented by a nuanced, comprehensive retrospective, held perhaps in the same place Andre’s work is now.

“Everything happened collaboratively,” Silverman says of the protests on April 1. “People did what they felt comfortable with.”

She and her collaborators tossed some of the cards onto Andre’s imposing zinc and wood sculptures. Twenty-five years ago, when Andre had a retrospective at New York’s Guggenheim, Silverman put the image of Mendieta on T-shirts, which she and other feminist members of the organization WAC had worn to the museum. Silverman is still frustrated when she considers representations of Mendieta at the time of her death. A New York magazine cover story showed Mendieta sitting on the floor surrounded by wine bottles, looking wild rather than incisive. She believes that Andre killed her friend, and recalls a quote she read in a 2011 New Yorker profile of him, from Philippe Vergne, MOCA’s director and the show’s original curator: “‘Carl broke something, and he was ostracized and that’s part of it!’”

She asks, “If it’s part of the story, then why isn’t it addressed by the museum?”

Vergne began planning the Andre retrospective while a senior curator at the Walker Art Center, mounted it as director of Dia Art Foundation in New York, then brought it to MOCA. Protesters threw a bucket of chicken blood and guts on the sidewalk outside the Dia headquarters, an homage to a 1974 performance by Mendieta, in which she stood nude in front of a creek, emptied a flask of chicken blood onto her flesh, then dropped to the ground to roll in white feathers. “It makes sense; it’s normal,” Vergne says of the protests. “We didn’t know what kind of shape and form it would take here.”

He isn’t certain whether the museum should acknowledge Andre’s indictment and acquittal in Mendieta’s death. “It’s a complicated question,” he says. Vergne points out that the show’s catalogue mentions Mendieta — via art historian Arnaud Pierre’s essay, which considers the phallic connotations of Andre’s brick, wood and metal art in contrast to Mendieta’s earthy tributes to the matriarchal, rather than incisive. She believes that Andre’s aesthetic often factors into discussions of the tragedy that ended her life. She made work about domestic violence and the body in nature. He made work that was formally controlled, out of industrial material.

“The conversation has to be about aesthetics,” Vergne says. “This is an art exhibition.”

But he does not think Andre’s work has been well served by conventional descriptions of minimalism as authoritative and austere.

“We have a very closed notion of minimalism,” he explains, noting that Andre refused to “produce” new work. “He would recycle,” using readily available, found material. “It was a very kind of low-key, ad hoc, unmonumental work,” Vergne says. “We just bought a new body of [Mendieta’s] work; she has a very important place.” He notes, before pointing out that the critic Anna Chave will be coming in June to speak at the museum. Chave spoke at Dia three years ago, on the occasion of the Andre show’s debut, and then published a fierce article in Art Journal about the routine failure of institutions to grapple with Mendieta’s legacy in relation to Andre’s exhibitions. She cited the 911 call Andre made after Mendieta fell from the window — “My wife is an artist and I’m an artist, and we had a quarrel about the fact that I was more, uh, exposed to the public than she was and she went to the bedroom and I went after her and she went out of the window” — tying her tragic fall to career comparisons just moments after. “Some male critics have suggested that, as Mendieta’s posthumous reputation grows, ill feeling toward the more celebrated Andre might accordingly subside; but the reverse may just as easily be imagined,” she wrote.

Alma Ruiz, the former MOCA curator who helped spearhead the acquisition of a suite of Mendieta’s Silhueta photographs and then organized a small show in 1997, tried unsuccessfully to organize a screening of the artist’s film work at MOCA in 2014. She would like to see a full museum treatment of Mendieta’s legacy, if not in 2020, then soon after. “I do wonder, though, why her work resonates so much with artists and the general public but not with local institutions,” she says via email. “I think we should find out by organizing a show here. But it may take a few years and a new generation of curators and museum leaders.”

On April 29, the morning before MOCA would host its annual gala amidst Andre’s work, a group of feminist artists sat around artist Mary Anna Pomonis’ dining table in Glassell Park. The group, the Association of Hysteric Art Curators, had published on Facebook an open letter on April 2. “One has to wonder why an Andre show?” they wrote. “As both a woman and a person of Latina descent, Mendieta, rather than Andre, has a historic connection to the city and the residents of Los Angeles that should have been recognized as important to MOCA.” That April morning, Pomonis explained that they had shifted the focus from protesting the Andre show to advocating for a Mendieta show and celebrating her work. They debated whether they should adopt “Ana Mendieta, 2020” as a slogan, and made plans to wear shirts with Mendieta’s face and work printed onto them on Thursday, May 2, when MOCA curator Bennett Simpson led a walk-through of Andre’s exhibition.

Adolfo Nodal would have liked to realize La Jungla in MacArthur Park, but Mendieta never sent drawings, so he felt he had too little information to go on. A Cuban refugee herself, Mendieta engaged the sizable community of Cuban refugees living in the park at that time. Some had mental illnesses and others were drug addicts. “She went over and hung out in some of the seedy places that they hung out,” Nodal recalls. She wanted to get to know them and to give the park a sculpture that would empower its disenfranchised residents. The redwoods would charge “the space with tenseness,” Nodal says, reading from a hand-written description Mendieta sent him more than 30 years ago.

Artist Cindy Rehm plans to perform a tribute to Mendieta on June 9, ideally at the same place in MacArthur Park where La Jungla would have stood. “She had always been really important to me as an artist,” says Rehm, whose performance, Traces (for Ana) pays tribute to the Silhueta work Mendieta made in the 1970s, when she inscribed the shape of her body into the earth. “Some of the earlier work captured that fragility between the inside and outside of the body.” Rehm wants the conversation to be more about making Mendieta’s work and legacy visible, though she acknowledges, “It is complicated, because you don’t want to ignore her death, either. I don’t know what her trajectory would have been if she had continued.”

Bodiless Arms Grope at Nothing in Roni Shneior’s West Adams Show

BY CATHERINE WAGLEY

This week, one artist plays with the notion of not being able to see while several explore what a Trump presidency means for art and our world.

Too Many Fingers
Roni Shneior’s sculpture Bloom is a tangle of 10 arms with no body, only knots in the middle where they more or less meet. As part of “Place in the Sun,” Shneior’s show at Joan, the sculpture sits on the floor in a corner of the room, the arms all reaching in different directions, their flesh pasty and discolored in places. Some fingers point while others are splayed—the fingers of one hand reach out to touch the wall. Made of papier-mâché, ceramic, plastic, wire and more, the arms serve as the strange, tactile, aspirational and confusing centerpiece for a show that also includes Ducks (little papier-mâché figures with hands for feet and wigs for heads) and paintings of anthropomorphic trees and bushes. The only painting not of flora is of an eye, an all-black, vacant, pupil-less thing that protrudes from a grayish canvas. None of the figures depicted in this show actually seems able to see, just to reach, droop up or spitting out a steady stream of white release), caressing and groping the green leaves of house plants. The hands look tentative, perhaps because they come from a postapocalyptic future in which greenery isn’t a thing. 1328 Kellam Ave., Echo Park; through July 6, by appointment. (323) 863-5428, gardenspace.la.

Our Current Climate
In the months since Donald Trump’s election, artists and curators have tried to address “our current political moment” in art exhibition settings. Some, like the collective that built a tree house on the U.S. Mexico border, have done a decent job; others have more or less failed (the Desert X extravaganza made only vague efforts to tackle immigration and walls). This weekend, a number of curators will convene at Clockshop for a talk called “Counter-Inaugurals,” about how artists, curators and organizations can effectively respond to the political system. Panelists include Anne Ellegood and Erin Christovale, both working on curating the next Hammer Biennial, and the collective What, How & for Whom (WHW), a Croatian group that recently curated the Istanbul Biennial. They’ve assembled a reading list for those hardcore participants who want to do homework before discussing the relevance of artwork in the era of Trump. 2806 Clearwater St., Elysian Valley; Tue., May 30, 7:30 p.m.; $5 donation. (323) 522-6014, clockshop.org.

Queer Mutant Underground
For the past seven years, performance artist Alejandro Segade has been using boy bands as a vehicle to understand corporate perversion, terrorism and a potential fascist state. He’ll complete the cycle of performances this week with Future St at the Broad. California has become Clonoforia, a homosexual police state largely inhabited by clones, where corporate boy bands and holographic talking heads dominate. It’s a world where right-wing figures like Peter Thiel have outsized control, and a pastiche of sci-fi, cartoon and dystopian influences (Blade Runner meets Lara Croft meets Spirited Away). There will be live music, costumes and possibly an uprising, as an underground consisting of “queer mutants” and “ancient feminists” try to overthrow the world order. 221 S. Grand Ave., downtown; Thu., June 1, 8:30 p.m.; $35. (213) 232-6203, thebroad.org.
CONSENT OF A WOMAN
Anna Ziegler’s penetrating drama Actually delves deeper than date rape on campus

BY DEBORAH KLUGMAN

In Anna Ziegler’s smart and penetrating play Actually, now premiering at the Geffen Playhouse, Tom (Jerry MacKinnon), a freshman at Princeton, recounts an incident in which his best buddy, Sunil, leans in and kisses him on the mouth. After the unequivocally heterosexual Tom tells Sunil to back off, the two men never mention it again, and they resume their friendship as before. How different, observes Tom, from his experience with women, who are “incapable of moving on, even if you make out once for five minutes on a fucking dance floor.”

As portrayed by MacKinnon, Tom is an attractive guy who scores lots of casual sex but is otherwise not especially worldly or predatory. Instead, he’s a lower-middle-class African-American kid who plays classical piano and has painstakingly made his way into the Ivy League. But now his future is threatened; a female freshman, a Jewish coed named Amber (Samantha Ressler), has accused him of rape, and he’s been called upon to face a three-person panel that will determine how much truth her statement holds. If her word is taken over his, Tom’s future may be toast.

To Tom, his predicament is bewildering; he’d been under the impression that Amber liked him and wanted to be intimate, moreover, he’d liked her as well, despite her awkward manner and sometimes tactless remarks, such as assuming he got into Princeton because he was black. In fact, to the audience observer, the hookup between these two young folks, despite its maladroitness, might even have the makings of a relationship, were circumstances different.

Unfortunately for Tom, the current circumstances include his having misread this latest conquest, an insecure woman who confesses to us her apprehensions about sex in general, and reveals that her drinking and partying are less a natural predilection than a response to pressure from her more sophisticated friend Heather (who gifts Amber with her own personal flask). Moreover, her hours of practice on the university squash team in tandem with her bar activities preclude any time for study, another thing that makes her nervous and uncomfortable in these first months away from home. But one thing she knows for sure is that she’s attracted to Tom. And she feels very bad to see him “alone” and without support, answering the questions of the prying panel.

This network of psychological nuance and the abundant detail Ziegler adds to her backstory make for a top-notch narrative that travels beyond the hot-button issue of date rape it tackles. The characters, Amber especially, are as finely etched as in a good novel, and as satisfying. Under Tyne Rafaeli’s direction, Ressler’s portrayal conjures a confused and maddeningly myopic young woman you alternately want to shake for her waffling ambivalence (she never actually says “no”) and comfort for her overwhelming anxiety. MacKinnon starts out a bit too much of a cypher, but his performance visibly deepens as the web tightens around his character.

Designer Tim Mackabee’s set resembles a textured wooden box that lighting designer Lap Chi Chu floods at certain junctures with varying hues of light. Pretty in places, I found it static, and wished for more lighting to be focused on the performers, when they rose from their seats, or when the story changed or shifted from past to present. By contrast, Vincent Olivieri sound design added notably to an uneasy ambience.

Johnny Depp’s Captain Jack is a Halloween costume in search of a story

BY ALAN SCHERSTUHL

Yes, dead men tell no tales — but neither, really, do the Pirates of the Caribbean movies.

Rather than stories, the series — of which this 2017 entry is the fifth — offers an unpalatable mix of mining slapstick, rote derring-do, ponderous CGI, whiskeys, and dandy mysticism, and dutiful action sequences whose only narrative purpose is to scramble the cast. (Every half-hour or so, one set of characters is taken prisoner by the other set of characters, following a hard-to-follow scuffle.)

Listen to kids chat about the films, and you won’t hear them say, “I like the one where Captain Jack finds the fountain of youth.” Instead, it’s all, “I like the part with the mermaids.” Daylong and bloated, the Pirates pictures have long been something like the treasure hunts at their centers: Persevere and you may find some payoff.

The part with the mermaids, from the series’ 2011 entry, is excellent, as programmatic big-budget, adventure filmmaking goes. Pirates scud through blue-black waters in a dinghy, a lighthouse behind them, the stillness breached only when the visage of a supernormal slips up along the prow. Rob Marshall (Into the Woods, Chicago) has never been the kind of director whose P.R. reps toss around the word “visionary,” but that sequence beats, in clarity and power, much of what Visionary Director Gore Verbinski chucked in our faces in Pirates of the Caribbean.

By Marshall’s film, On Stranger Tides, the comic relief had been promoted to hero, with the effect of marginalizing the foreground, an imp made to deliver expositional hokum. Imagine if Groucho cared deeply from the first frame about whatever the stuffed shirts at the opera care about — and then, in the course of helping them out, was tasked with explaining the plot. (Not that Captain Jack has fed his lines through an earpiece under his wig. “I have to walk up stairs for all this?” Jack complains in this installment, and it’s hard not to imagine the star himself asking that from the comfort of his trailer. Depp finds no fresh angles on Jack in this outing, and he doesn’t really seem to have looked. But at least the script never demands that Jack appear to give a shit about much.

KIDS KNOW BETTER THAN TO WEIGH DOWN THE FUN WITH THIS CHAPTER’S DYNASTIC PLOTTING — EVERYONE IS SOMEONE ELSE’S SON OR DAUGHTER.

So Sparrow remains the series’ heart, as well as the void at its center, in a story that is something akin to what children might imagine when playing pirates themselves: a vague series of scrapes, betrayals and magic spells, all in pursuit of the latest bar-nacled chotchke, in this case the trident of Poseidon. Kids, of course, would know better than to weigh down the fun with this chapter’s dynastic plotting — everyone, it seems, is someone else’s son or daughter, a gambit to make the stabbings and the pratfalls seem to mean something.

The marketing suggested that this time Jack might be the chotchke, that the series might now offer us new characters searching for him, as The Force Awakens did with Luke Skywalker. Alas, Sparrow turns up something like 12 minutes in, in what is admittedly his best entrance since the original. As in the first film, second-banana heroes drive the plot, a drip of a swashbuckler dude and a peppy heroine who seems smart and capable at the start but will still need plenty of saving. Because everyone is forever being captured in these movies, I wouldn’t complain about that angle if it weren’t for the fact that, rather than save the day herself, Kaya Scodelario’s headstrong and self-actualized astronaut-adventurer spends most of the climax trying to wake up her nonentity helpmate (Brenton Thwaites) so he can do it. While dispiriting, her pleas and tiny slaps may be the only things here that resonate in our world: They might signal to adults that the movie is ending, and it’s at last time to wake up.

DEADHEADS GET THE GOOD, THE UGLY IN THIS NEW DOC

Don’t expect Amir Bar-Lev’s Long Strange Trip, a sweeping if not very penetrating look at the 30-year career of the Grateful Dead, to offer major revelations. For any Deadhead — and it’s hard to imagine any other kind of viewer settling in for the four-hour running time — the basic outlines of the band’s history will be familiar.

But if the story is known, the telling is here lusher than any before, the film stuffed with rare archival footage and performance clips. The effect is one of coating along amid a vast, noisy, variegated parade, vividly rendered.

Bar-Lev takes us through Jerry Garcia’s early days as a bluegrass plucker and coffeehouse folk bard, through the band’s time gigging at Ken Kesey’s acid tests, on to its explosive commercial growth in the 1980s and ’90s, when the Dead become a colossus. Early scenes bring us inside the anarchic Bay Area scene that had begun to take a darker turn in the twilight of the hippie era; the closing section is a study of Garcia’s entrapment within the thing he made.

Bar-Lev renders it all immersively, without shying away from the ugly parts. Early clips of an impossibly young and clean-cut Garcia, clowning with lyricist Robert Hunter, are alone worth the time. By the later years, the film’s focus shifts to the chaos of the Deadhead tour scene, in which hordes of kids (mostly white, mostly middle-class) go looking for something different in Reagan-era America. Much of the narrative is told through roadies, sound guys and tour managers in recent interviews, characters one degree outside the inner circle. —Jon Campbell

WHO KNEW CATE BLANCHETT WANTED TO BE TRACEY ULLMAN?

That’s probably not the reaction director Julian Rosefeldt hopes will be stirred by this rigorous series of monologues, stitched together from more than 50 artistic and political manifestos and performed by Blanchett as 13 characters. But, like Ullman, Blanchett takes the external markers of her characters (costumes, hair, makeup) and internalizes a persona for each, imbued with a distinct accent and body language. It’s the exercise of impersonation as a process of revelation, and it’s marked by a surprising lightness.

That puckish humor isn’t apparent right away. Manifesto was shot in Berlin, and the first scenes establish it as an aesthetic companion to Wim Wenders’ Wings of Desire, that portrait of a walled-in metropolis. Rosefeldt and cinematographer Christoph Krauss employ many overhead shots (the angels’ point of view for Wenders), frame modern architecture with formalist symmetry, and lovingly glide the camera over people engaged in everyday activities, all while maintaining an emotional distance. This open Berlin still feels contained, its population honeycombed into steel-and-glass hives.

The creeping sense of dislocation tips into science-fiction territory when Blanchett appears in a beautifully wrought sterile environment wearing a white hazmat coverall, her voice echoing on the PA system as she recites the manifestos of early Soviet artists extolling suprematism (imagery based on geometric forms) and constructivism (a utilitarian approach to artistic production). Rosefeldt doesn’t identify the movements or authors of each manifesto until the end credits, so that Blanchett’s performances serve as our guide in relating the words to the imagery.

Even as Rosefeldt mines intellectual elitism, he reveals a disdain for pretension in the film’s centerpiece monologue. Blanchett’s speaker addresses a well-heeled, buttoned-up grave-side audience. With black French netting framing her face like a fencing mask, she ferociously espouses Dadaism in a tone that suggests she’s excoriating the dead in the guise of praise. Dada at a funeral is an inspired contrast, puncturing the kind of polite ritual that stifles messy grieving with the radical art of nonsense inspired by those lost to the carnage of World War I.

Manifesto originated as individual pieces of a film installation. Condensing it into a 95-minute narrative with editor Bobby Good, Rosefeldt emphasizes small moments, like the tiny puffs of exasperation exuded by bored kids as their conservative mother recites “I Am for an Art” (sculptor Claes Oldenburg’s pop-art manifesto) as the very long grace before a meal. (Blanchett’s husband, Andrew Upton, and their three towheaded sons play her family.) The actress is equally committed, regardless of whether content and context click, but she soars when they do. The discussion of conceptual art and minimalism by a TV-news anchor and a correspondent (both Blanchett) perfectly captures the clipped cadence of information being batted back and forth between professionals. Back to you, Cate.

Death Proof, With its Already Vintage Look, Celebrates Its 10th Anniversary

Friday, May 26

Quentin Tarantino’s Death Proof, the more daring half of the 2007 double feature Grindhouse, celebrates its 10th anniversary this year. To mark the occasion, the New Beverly Cinema is showing the “extended international version” in 35mm. The grungy aesthetics, pay homage to the high-octane car flicks of the 1970s (Vanishing Point, Gone in 60 Seconds, Dirty Mary, Crazy Larry, et al.), but the white-hot revenge plot — in which four women pursue a psychotic, homicidal movie stuntman (Kurt Russell) in an extended bout of road rage — is pure QT. “Buckle your seatbelts,” Bette Davis once said in another movie, “it’s going to be a bumpy night.” New Beverly Cinema, 7165 Beverly Blvd., Fairfax; Fri., May 26, 11:59 p.m.; $8. The versatile Jonathan Demme carved out one of the most eclectic careers in the movie business before passing away in April. After cutting his teeth in exploitation, he slalomed between comedy, drama, romance, thriller, and documentary with the dexterity of a natural. In memoriam, the Egyptian Theatre screens Stop Making Sense, Demme’s visual record of a 1983 Talking Heads performance at the Pantages Theater. Stripped of the usual concert film tropes (backstage interviews, audience reaction shots, etc.), it’s a brilliant yet self-effacing tribute to a joyous musical act. Egyptian Theatre, 6712 Hollywood Blvd., Hollywood; Sat., May 27, 7:30 p.m.; $12. (323) 466-3456, americancinemathequecalendar.com.

Sunday, May 28

Italian filmmakerLisa Wertmüller enjoyed a burst of fame in the United States in the early 1970s for a series of aggressive, lyrical, irreverent comedies, inspiring rapturous comparisons to Fellini. The Cinemafamily screens six newly restored films as part of their tribute to Wertmüller, who at 88 is the subject of Behind the White Glasses, a flattering documentary portrait. Seven Beauties, the nervy concentration camp comedy that earned her two Oscar nominations (including one for Best Director — the first ever given to a woman), is the most provocative of the bunch. The climactic scene involves Giancarlo Giannini (wonderful as a bug-eyed Casanova) making agonized love to a porcine Nazi commandant (Shirley Stoler) in order to escape hard labor. “A very special artistic vision,” as Martin Scorsese poetically offers. Cinemafamily/Silent Movie Theatre, 611 N. Fairfax Ave., Fairfax; Wed. May 31, 7:30 p.m.; $12. (323) 655-2510, cinemafamily.org.

Once or twice a year, the American Cinematheque hauls out a glorious 70mm print of David Lean’s Lawrence of Arabia. The crystalline digital restoration of 2012 looks superb on Blu-ray, but to see this 1962 masterpiece on film, with each pop and scratch suggesting a living entity with a definite shelf life, is a different experience entirely. When the lights go down and the first percussive notes of Maurice Jarre’s overture pierce the stadium, a viewer can be truly happy. Lean’s reconstruction of WWI officer T.E. Lawrence needs no introduction, except to say that if any film was meant to be seen on the big screen, it’s this one. Aero Theatre, 1328 Montana Ave., Santa Monica; Sun., May 28, 7:30 p.m.; $12. (323) 466-3456, americancinemathequecalendar.com.

Elaine May is gradually building a cult reputation as one of the great unsung writer-directors, and the New Beverly Cinema knows it. The two films they’ve selected demonstrate her comedic range, as well as her wonky humanism. A New Leaf, in which she co-stars alongside Matthew Matthau, is a painfully funny comedy about a middle-aged playwright who conspires to marry a socially maladroit heiress. The underrated Ishtar, a toothsome sendup of U.S. foreign policy in the Middle East, is also ripe for reappraisal. A notorious box office bomb, it has gracefully withstood the test of time, thanks to some expert clowning by Warren Beatty and Dustin Hoffman (trysting for some Bob Hope/Bing Crosby magic) and Vittorio Storaro’s handsome cinematography. New Beverly Cinema, 7165 Beverly Blvd., Fairfax; Sat., May 27, 7:30 p.m.; $8. (323) 938-4038, theynewbev.com.

Monday, May 29

Five Came Back, the new Netflix documentary based on Mark Harris’s best-selling book, profiles five American directors whose state-sanctioned propaganda helped bolster morale during the darkest days of WWII. As a Memorial Day tribute, the Egyptian is presenting five of these wartime documentaries, one for each featured director: Prelude to War (Frank Capra), How to Operate Behind Enemy Lines (John Ford), The Memphis Belle: A Story of a Flying Fortress (William Wyler), Nazi Concentration Camps (George Stevens), and Let There Be Light (John Huston). Huston’s was singled out by the National Film Registry as an important contribution to the history of cinema, but the others are no less worthy. *Aero Theatre, 1328 Montana Ave., Santa Monica; Mon., May 29, 3 p.m.; free with RSVP. Thursday, June 1

Laemmle’s Throwback Thursday series continues with a screening of Barbarella, the 1968 s-f sex comedy starring Jane Fonda as Jean-Claude Forest’s comic strip protagonist, a nubile space traveler with a penchant for erotic mis-adventures. Sample dialogue: “Make love? But nobody’s done that for centuries!” Emancipated feminist icon or flawed male fantasy? The jury is still out, but meanwhile there are immediate pleasures in Roger Vadim’s campy, PG-rated spoof, including some eye-popping production design and a variety of ingenious props. *Laemmle NoHo, 9420 Lankershim Blvd., North Hollywood; Thu., June 7, 7:30 p.m.; $11. ome say the pressure to survive Compton is so great that it creates diamonds. If that’s true, then Centennial High School’s music program, under the leadership of Manuel Castaneda, is one of its ice dispensers.

When Castaneda became music director at Centennial in 2012, marching band was the main focus. Only 25 students participated. Before Centennial, he was teaching band and string orchestra at Ralph J. Bunche Middle School, also in Compton. In a mere five years at Bunche, he established a respected music program, but when his students graduated to Centennial, “Several who experienced academic and musical success were failing classes and or quitting band all together,” Castaneda recalls. “They weren’t having the success that I wanted for them.”

Known as the alma mater of Dr. Dre, DJ Quik and Kendrick Lamar, Centennial is now helping students fortify their futures via music. Ninety-five percent of participants in the music program, according to Castaneda, go on to four-year colleges on full or partial scholarships. “[It’s the] accomplishment that I am most proud of,” he says.

The city that birthed gangsta rap has changed demographically; though once predominantly African-American, it is now nearly two-thirds Latino, according to the 2010 U.S. Census. But the trauma of violence has remained constant. The Los Angeles Times’ homicide report lists 28 murders in the last 12 months in Compton, a city of fewer than 100,000 residents.

At Centennial, some students have such threatening or unstable home lives that they don’t want to go home after school. So Castaneda spends about 20 hours a week working with his students outside of classroom hours. “Living about a mile and a half away, I can stay at the school. Some of my colleagues … wish to stay, but they may have an hour drive home,” Castaneda laments.

Born and raised in Compton, he picked up the trumpet in the fifth grade. He played in Bunche’s music program and went on to join the marching band at Centennial. The school’s music director at the time, John Roberts, was a retired singer-songwriter, orchestrator and conductor, who had worked with Barry White and scored his own minor hit in 1967 with “Sockin’ 1-2-3-4.”

Roberts taught with passion, putting the band through rigorous practice. He expected them to win competitions. Castaneda was soon playing at higher levels than he thought possible. It was a revelation, and propelled him into his own career in music education. “One day I jokingly told my band leader that I would come back and be band director here,” he says.

After he began teaching at Bunche, Castaneda learned that Centennial’s then-music director preferred teaching middle school, “so we swapped,” he explains. “It was so surreal to sit in the chair that my band director used to sit in.”

In Castaneda’s first two months as music director, the marching band won second place in the drum-off competition at the annual Battle of the High School Marching Bands at the Home Depot Center (now StubHub Center) in Carson, beating out other bands from around the country, as well as dealing with intense competition from rival high schools in Inglewood, Long Beach and Carson. It solidified the students’ confidence, giving Castaneda the momentum to motivate them further. “My first year was about building a music conservatory-type culture of higher standards.”

When Centennial’s marching band was featured on The Ellen DeGeneres Show, it seemed as if the music program had arrived. But Castaneda wanted to diversify its curriculum. The way some students related to music wasn’t conducive to marching band; they weren’t “genuinely interested in joining,” he recalls.

When Castaneda took over, Centennial only offered band classes, music history and general music courses. In the marching band’s off-season, the new music director added string orchestra, jazz band, concert band and advanced-placement music theory.

Today, the marching band has 35 to 50 members — not including the drill team, cheerleaders, majorettes and dance team. The string orchestra is anticipating an additional 15 to 20 members for the 2017-2018 school term.

Castaneda’s students haven’t stopped rocking competitions, regularly placing first or second. This year the marching band won first place in the Los Angeles Kingdom Day Parade. The jazz band took second at the San Francisco Heritage Festival, after placing first last year.

Music education isn’t cheap, and while Compton’s school board funds most of Centennial’s art initiatives, nonprofits and donors supplement their remaining needs. In 2013, Lamar donated $50,000 to the music department. For years, the Mr. Holland’s Opus Foundation, inspired by the movie, has donated instruments. Other organizations including Turnaround Arts, Music Unites, L.A. County Arts for All and VH1 Save the Music Foundation provide additional funding and collaborate with Compton schools to teach critical thinking through arts education.

“The goal of all of these programs is to teach children to read, play and appreciate music,” secondary curriculum and instruction administrator Dr. Shaunte Knox said via a written statement, in response to questions about Centennial High’s music program. “We have seen the positive impact of music in education, so we plan to continue to feed our students’ educational and musical appetites through these programs.”

The students themselves vouch for the music program’s positive effects. Senior Randy Pozas was the marching band’s captain for the past three years, a role he says taught him leadership skills. In the off-season, he played bass guitar for the jazz band. This fall he’ll pursue a music degree at California State University, Dominguez Hills.

Castaneda, says Pozas, “inspired me … you wanted his approval. For him it’s about hard work. That’s what he always tells us. If you work hard, you achieve a lot and get a lot in return.”

Marching band student Julian Antonio says that when he was a freshman at Centennial, “I was lost and didn’t know what to do with my time.” His young uncle was a part of the marching band and encouraged him to join. “Mr. C would see me after school and be like, ‘Come through, man.’”

After joining the drum line, Antonio went on to become part of the jazz band and orchestra. In 2016, he was featured playing percussion in Kendrick Lamar’s “Compton: Witness Greatness” video, produced for the Grammy Awards.

“The music kind of honed my interest. It overlapped into my classes and helped me get straight in school,” Antonio says.

As the oldest of three and a first-generation Mexican-American, he is the first in his family to go to college. He attends the University of California, San Diego, majoring in mathematics and economics. He’s thinking of becoming a teacher.
From a mythic scuffle with Jim Morrison to jamming with Bill Clinton, War’s Lonnie Jordan has had some adventures.

By Jeff Weiss

Lonnie Jordan swears he didn’t punch Jim Morrison. Don’t listen to what anyone at that party at Eric Burdon’s house tells you — the longtime keyboardist for quintessentially L.A. band War vividly remembers the details.

“I put my finger on [Morrison’s] chest and he fell backward into the fireplace in slow motion,” Jordan says nearly a half-century later, laughing poolside at his Whittier house, which is adorned with War plaques, posters and awards. “He curled up into the fetal position and stayed there.”

This was shortly after Burdon and their future manager and producer, Jerry Goldstein, found the band backing football star Deacon Jones at North Hollywood club Rag Doll and plucked them from semi-obscenity. With the former Animals singer as their new frontman, they cut “Spill the Wine,” which launched them to stardom.

The Morrison fracas occurred during a party-turned—late night jam session with War and Burdon. According to Jordan, everyone was on acid but him. It all started when Morrison leapt up onto Jordan’s piano in a Superman outfit.

“He said, ‘I bet you’d like to hit me, huh?’ I said, ‘Man, you need to get out of my face ... or take a nap,’” Jordan says. “He kept his fists up, and I’m from Compton, so I knew I had to be alert. Next thing I knew, he was in the fireplace.”

The story concludes with a woman frantically running into the house, screaming “James, James, has anyone seen James?”

Jordan pointed to the fireplace; she scooped him up and took him home. He later discovered that Morrison idolized Burdon and often wound up passed out on couches or bathrooms at his parties.

The 68-year-old has enough surreal tales for several lifetimes. Jimi Hendrix sat in with War for his final performance. (“He wanted to jam with us — we ended up doing ‘Mother Earth’ by Memphis Slim, and he went back to Mother Earth the next day.”) There’s the War gig in San Francisco, where a campaigning Bill Clinton joined them for a sax riff or two. (“He couldn’t play a lick, but he had the attitude of a musician.”)

Even if he’d lacked stories about his collaborators, the work War has left behind is canonical enough. The Compton High grad learned drums, piano and bass as a child. His grandmother, who sang gospel and blues, mostly raised him and his three brothers. He joined War as a teen, when they were still called Nightshift. The L.A. analog to Sly and the Family Stone or Santana, War remains a multi-ethnic ensemble that distilled the city’s eclectic chaos into a coherent sound — fusing rock, jazz, R&B, funk, salsa, psychedelia, blues and reggae. Their biggest post-Burdon hits, “Why Can’t We Be Friends,” “Low Rider” and “The Cisco Kid,” will rightfully be played on oldies radio for eternity. Rap brought them a second wave of relevancy, as Ice T, The Beastie Boys, De La Soul, 2Pac and Brand Nubian sampled their music.

A 1996 falling-out with Goldstein led the remaining original members, save for Jordan, to reform as the Lowrider Band. Jordan has carried on the War name, performing internationally and domestically, including an upcoming show at the Greek.

“It was all street communication,” Jordan says. “We came from the streets, and our music was rooted in that. I always say that our fans are the ones who wrote the lyrics because we just that took that experience and set it to music.”

War Stories

I've been living in Peru for a little less than a week. I spent several days in Lima, but for the last few, I've been in Cuzco, way up in the Peruvian Andes.

It's great to get a few days off from the proximity of Comrade Trump. Watching him blow so hard from such a great distance is almost like watching the battle scene in a film with the sound turned off.

A few days ago, I got a letter from a teacher at an East Coast university, who told me he had enjoyed a recent radio show I had done on KCRW with my bestest friend, Ian MacKaye. The topic and accompanying music, all selected by lan, were shows that we went to together from 1979 to 1981. We saw some great ones, and there are plenty of stories to tell. Music changed our lives.

What the teacher found interesting in our conversation were the ideas of going to shows as ritual and of the music you like as a self-referencing identifier. Both of these, especially the latter, are major concepts in my thinking. You can tell a lot about someone — what interests them, their idiosyncrasies and priorities — just by what's in their living space.

It was a long time ago, but I remember occasionally going to my father’s house on the weekends. His wife had a lot of stuff, mostly books on law and crime investigation. Besides clothes and reading glasses, my father seemed to have no personal items. He didn’t have a photo album, a badge of distinction, or anything. He seemed to want to keep his identity to himself. The only thing I remember him by are the clothes and the things he said.

My mother had paintings on the walls, several shelves of books and a whole lot of records. There was always a stack of New Yorker magazines that she tried to keep up with. For information, she mainly read The Washington Post and The New York Times. She often had the turntable going for hours. All high-density stuff: classical, jazz, Streisand, Dylan. She went to the museums and galleries all over town, and in the neighborhood. She was a woman of Irish descent and the middle class, who worked for the government. But really, she was all those books and records.

When I was in high school, I never really understood why people wore T-shirts of bands, even if I liked the band. It seemed like a lot of work. This changed when the local skateboarders in the neighborhood, all four of us, decided we were a team and had T-shirts made. It wasn’t the idea of a uniform look that appealed to me. I wore one five days a week at the prep school I went to. The thing I liked was that by merely wearing these shirts, we had individualized ourselves and, in our own way, peeled off from others.

A few years later, I heard bands like The Ramones and The Clash, and that was it. My feet were finally on the ground, and my shield had an insignia. I was still me, but I identified so deeply with these records and how they made me feel that they became me as well.

The records were one thing, but actually being in the same room with these bands — that was the point of no return. Those shows changed the way I thought about everything, and I have never come back.

Every once in a while, I have crossed paths with some of the people from these groups. I try to say as little as possible and just thank them. What I am thanking them for is so much more than the music they made. As far as my thinking goes, my parents gave me existence, but these bands gave me life. I can’t pay that back. All I am usually able to do is thank them and look at the ground.

Perhaps the best way to thank them is to go to the show when you can. Some bands I see whenever I can, and others I just listen to the records a lot, but I try to keep the conversation going— one way, as it is.

Going back to the observation the teacher made, and turning the harsh light of scrutiny on myself, my record collection could explain my countless insecurities and the fact that we’re living in a material land, and I am a material man. The more records, the better.

A few days ago, in Lima, I walked across the city to get to Kat Records. The directions were less than great. By the time I got there, I had sweated through my shirt, used up my bottle of water and wasn’t looking forward to the multimile hike back to the hotel during rush hour.

Kat was more of a record stall than a store. There were perhaps 200 records in a narrow row of bins. Also, it was closed. The great part was that there were two guys waiting patiently for the owner to return. I asked them when they thought the store would reopen and neither of them knew, but that didn’t seem to matter. I think they knew that the wait was worth it, because there was something they could soon internalize and make their own might be waiting for them in the bins.

That kind of discovery is as important as air. It’s one of the ways you find yourself.

Blackest of the Black Festival
@ OAK CANYON PARK
Heavy-metal icon Glenn Danzig’s Blackest of the Black festival has had several incarnations throughout its 20-year history, at times being a full, nationwide tour; other times a single-day event. This year’s installment is going the destination-festival route and expanding to a two-day celebration of heavy music and dark art. Danzig’s headlining performance is the main draw on Saturday night. Heavy-metal’s man in black has lined up Venice hardcore heroes Suicide Tendencies to headline on Friday night.
Friday-night’s lineup also includes Inland Empire deathcore titans Suicide Silence and rising L.A. industrial-metal faves 3Teeth. Saturday’s bill is highlighted by Al Jourgensen’s industrial veterans Ministry and Japanese hard-rockers Vamps. All of the festivities will be surrounded by interactive, haunted house–style attractions inspired by Danzig’s music and graphic novels. Also on Saturday, May 27.

Lightning in a Bottle
@ SAN ANTONIO RECREATION AREA
Produced by the Do LaB, best-known for their colorful Coachella stage, Lightning in a Bottle began as a small underground party for members of the Burning Man scene but has since grown into one of the biggest and best alternative-music festivals on the West Coast. Returning to the San Antonio Recreation Area in Monterey County for the fourth straight year, the 2017 incarnation of LIB features four stages; two bar areas with DJs; guest speakers and panels; yoga and meditation; cooking classes; burlesque shows; and enough activities and sensory overload to keep attendees busy for its entire six-day duration (the event kicks off Wednesday, May 24). On the music front, the main draws are headline Bassnectar, Bonobo and Richie Hawtin, but the lineup is stacked with talent, including future bass purveyors Paper Diamond and eDIT, Colombian psyche-delic cumbia party-starters Bomba Estéreo, and the raw-nerve folk-rock of Thao & the Get Down Stay Down. Through Monday, May 29.

The Adicts
@ THE BELASCO
Few punk anthems of rebellion are as thrilling — and catchy — as The Adicts’ ever-timely “Viva la Revolution.” Over Pete Davison’s thrashing sorts of buzzsaw guitar, face-painted singer Keith Warren giesefully urges, “Drink the wine from the rich man’s cask. This revolution won’t be the last.” He’s openly calling for class warfare (“Smash the symbols of the life never had”), but he does it in such an insolently cheeky and merrily swaggering way that even the most curmudgeonly Scrooge won’t be able to help tapping his foot in time on the way to the guillotine. It’s not the British band’s fault that many of their most Adicting classics came early on with their 1981 debut album, Songs of Praise, but they continued to pair the same kind of shout-along glam-rock choruses with rousing, nonstop punk energy on 2012’s underrated All the Young Droogs. –Falling James

Jean-Michel Jarre
@ MICROSOFT THEATER
When Jean-Michel Jarre released Electronica Pts. 1 and 2 in 2015 and 2016, they served as testament to the breadth of his influence. From fellow electronic-music pioneers Laurie Anderson and John Carpenter to synth-pop master Vince Clarke and techno innovator Jeff Mills to relative younguns like Boys Noize and M83, the list of collaborators spans generations. Jarre’s 1976 landmark album, Oxygène, made him a titan of electronic music. A global phenomenon, Jarre is expressive in his solo career. On her fifth album, Existential Beast, Richards enchants with a distinctive blend of spacey, harmony-laden pop (“Back to the Source”) and intimate folk balladry (“Autumn Sun”). But she also tours out amid the swirling psychedelic guitars and jazzy dynamic shifts of the hard-rocking epic “Golden Gate.”

Miranda Lee Richards
@ THE FEDERAL
Miranda Lee Richards had a couple of breaks on her way to finding her own voice as a singer and guitarist. She was befriended early on by Metallica’s Kirk Hammett, who gave her guitar lessons, and she sang with The Brian Jonestown Massacre for a spell after its leader, Anton Newcombe, heard her first demos. Since then, the San Francisco native has recorded in the studio or performed onstage with Tricky and The Jesus and Mary Chain. But she’s at her most expressive in her solo career. On her fifth album, Existential Beast, Richards

Simi Valley Cajun & Blues Music Festival
@ RANCHO SANTA SUSAANNA COMMUNITY PARK
While music-festival culture increasingly leans toward bank account–draining burnout, this kickin’ little shindig is the exception. With some of Louisiana’s top-ranking talents — Lazy Lester, the fabulously kicked-back blues harp chieftain of “I Hear You Knockin’” fame; the souped-up fiddle and shout of the indefatigable Doug Kershaw; the superb traditionalist Jo-El Sonnier — the event’s titular sounds are nobly represented. Along with Doors axeman Robbie Krieger’s riff-slinging and high-velocity workouts from Yardbirds drummer Jim McCarty and his gung of hired hands, you also get a truly wild, wild card — the brilliantly incendiary Detroit rocker Mitch Ryder, a sensational, vastly influential and criminally underappreciated stylist whose frantic, irresistibly biting records cleared the way for The MC5 and The Stooges. Also Sunday, May 28.

@ GREEK THEATRE
Known as much these days for his entertaining Twitter account and his role in La La Land, John Legend remains a prolific musician as well. His latest album, Darkness and Light, released late last year, features an assortment of eclectic guest talent, including Chance the Rapper, Brittany Howard and Miguel. Produced by Blake Mills, the album showcases the 38-year-old Legend’s blend of R&B and soul, along with his fearless willingness to experiment. His cinematic endeavors go beyond his acting. T.I.
@ THE BELASCO
Atlanta rapper, philanthropist, television producer and strip-club owner T.I. aka Tip is quite the entrepreneur. Deemed “the Jay Z of the South” by none other than iconic producer Pharrell, the mogul certainly doesn’t waste the power of his influence. In December 2016, he released Us or Else: A Letter to the System, a project featuring such forces as Killer Mike, Quavo and Big K.R.I.T. in support of the #BlackLivesMatter movement with a fearless take on police brutality and current race relations in America. Earlier this month, he released a short accompanying film, Us or Else, no doubt a preface to what is sure to be a powerful performance by T.I. and his Hustle Gang. —Artemis Thomas-Hansard

Oh Land
@ MASONIC LODGE
Nanna Øland Fabricius carries within her sweet voice the shadow of a dagger. This is not to say that she’ll use it on you — not directly, anyway. Sometimes all you need is the shadow of a dagger to make a point. Through four studio albums and one record of soundtrack work, Oh Land has presented a vision of femininity that crackles with reversals and salient points. Just when you think you’ve pegged her as yet another disposable pop act, you notice that you’re bleeding from a cut somewhere on your body, a place you usually don’t look at. She uses choreography like another instrument in her videos — most perfectly on “Renaissance Girls” — as greater commentary on the human condition, frail and multifaceted as it tends to be, all coalescing into the spectacular action you will witness tonight. —David Cotner

Dead & Company
@ HOLLYWOOD BOWL
After the Grateful Dead said “Fare Thee Well” in 2015, surviving core members Bob Weir, Bill Kreutzmann and Mickey Hart decided to keep “Playing in the Band” with stalwart keyboardist Jeff Chimenti. They invited Allman Brothers Band bassist Oteil Burbridge and Grammy winner John Mayer to get on the bus, and the resulting band, Dead & Company, are now back in Southern California on their third U.S. tour in two years. While traditionalist Deadheads have felt understandably alienated, others have gravitated toward the bluesy, funky, soulful influence Mayer has asserted on the Grateful Dead songbook. After two tours of exclusively classic stuff, rumors suggest that this Dead & Company outing is slated to feature songs from Weir’s 2016 cowboy album, Blue Mountain, which would be a welcome addition to the hallowed Deadhead canon. —Jackson Truax

Springtime Carnivore
@ THE BOOTLEG
“I build my world around you … I never stop dreaming of you,” John Darnielle mutters enigmatically on “Rain in Soho,” from The Mountain Goats’ 16th album, Goths. The record is a series of homages to goth legends of the past. Although leader Darnielle composed all the songs as usual, bassist Peter Hughes explains on the Mountain Goats website that the rest of the band also consider themselves “erstwhile goths” who marvel at the idea of “Pat Travers showing up to a Bauhaus show looking to jam.” In an interesting twist, the album was recorded without guitars. The hints of gothic menace on “Rain in Soho” emanate from dark piano chords and rumbling tom-toms, whereas the mellow idyll “Andrew Eldritch Is Moving Back to Leeds” is closer to Darnielle’s usual low-key folk. —Falling James
